

Suppose each of  $\lambda N$  people are assigned independently and uniformly to one of  $N$  types. We know that the number of people of a given type will have roughly a Poisson distribution with mean  $\lambda$ . Now suppose that you are searching for a particular individual but only know her type. What is the probability that the first person you come across of this type is the correct individual?